his first victim was fellow science pupil, Christopher Williams, who suffered an extended period of vomiting, painful cramps, and headaches, due to the judicious administration, by Young, of a cocktail of poisons that left medical experts baffled. Williams was lucky to survive, probably because Young could not fully satisfy his scientific curiosity. (Small photo)

Fred Young was admitted to hospital, where he was diagnosed with antimony poisoning. He was lucky to have survived his son's experimentation, but could not countenance his son's responsibility: that role fell to Young's school chemistry teacher, who contacted the police when he discovered poisons, and copious material about poisoners, in Young's school desk.

On September 18, 2012, Cregan made a hoax emergency call to the police. Nicola Hughes, 23, and Fiona Bone, 32, constables serving with Greater Manchester Police, were mobilised to Cregan's call in Hattersley. When they arrived, Cregan shot them and threw an M75 hand grenade at them. Both officers were hit by at least eight bullets as Cregan fired 32 shots in 31 seconds.
